A Christmas Story comes to life at the Mounds Theatre this December

The Mounds Theatre presents A Christmas Story - Live! Based on humorist Jean Shepherd’s memoirs of growing up in the Midwest in the 1940s, it follows 9-year-old Ralphie Parker in his quest to get a genuine Red Ryder BB Gun under the tree for Christmas. Ralphie plead's his case before his mother, his teacher and even Santa Claus himself. The consistent response: “You'll shoot your eye out.”

All your favorite moments of the film are brought to life on stage, including the family’s temperamental exploding furnace; Scut Farkus, the school bully; the boy’s experiment with a wet tongue on a cold flagpole; the Little Orphan Annie decoder pin; Ralphie’s father winning a lamp shaped like a woman’s leg in a net stocking; Ralphie’s fantasy scenarios and more.

The play is directed by Chad Allen, with scenic design by Don Eller, costume design by Sherry Johnson, and lighting design by Ursula Bowden.

Here’s a little more information on what expect during the December 4th Kinetic Kitchen performance: “Nayika” - a collaboration of Jazz and Bharatnatyam dance. According to Natyashastra (a text on Indian dance) written in the 4th and 5th century BC, women are classified according to age, experience, physical and mental situations, moods and sentiments. These heroines are called Nayikas.

Ranee Ramaswamy will collaborate with singer Charmin Michelle to present two genres of heroines to show how similar we all are when it comes to emotions and feelings. Guitarist Joel Shapira will accompany Ms. Michelle. In “Nayika” the audience will be able to see one style of dance to two types of music, both Indian and Jazz.

Thoughts on recycling plastic, paper and presidents

By Mary Petrie

Eureka and George W. Bush have me thinking about recycling these days. And no, these two entities don’t have much in common other than the way they’ve nestled together in my brain.

Actually, my ruminations can be traced back one step further. As someone with a couple of degrees in English Literature, I’ve heard more than my fair share of scholars and writers proclaim: there are no new narratives. The theory is that there are a handful of stories and we simply recycle them. While the specifics vary (who comes of age or what country is ransacked or whose husband/wife cheated or who died or who was born or who risked everything for love), we as a species keep playing out, and writing about, the same dramas over and again.

I’ve always resisted this idea. What about me, cries Ego? Aren’t I something else? Even better, aren’t I unique? If there were nothing new under the sun, wouldn’t we all be bored silly by now?

But a few weeks ago, I became inexplicably enamored with the idea of recycling! Thanks to Eureka first, then George W.

I was dutifully sorting bottles into bags of white, brown and green when I wondered how long the glass in my bin would circulate through the world. Suddenly, I was taken with the idea that this white Annie’s Goddess Salad Dressing bottle and that brown sticky Eden Tamari would appear in somebody’s pantry as jars and bottles of baby foods, vitamins or wine. Ecologically speaking, it would be wonderful if there was nothing new under the sun, just the same old garbage used over and over again. This was hardly cosmic awakening or epiphany; I had my moment of whimsy, crammed two weeks worth of newspapers into the blue bin and moved on.

The next day, I received a letter from Eureka Recycling. I took this as some sort of sign from Above. Perhaps what I mistook for fancy and distraction was indeed a larger message? I was onto something with my recycling ruminations. Here was proof, instant messaging of sorts.

The letter alerted me to the fact that the very nature of recycling was changing: no longer would I have to separate glass by color! I could finally toss our plastic milk jugs curbside (only plastic bottles, no food tubs or take-outs). Indeed, the whole system had changed. In the brave new world of St. Paul recycling, all glass bottles, metal cans and nicely flattened plastic bottles could go in a single bag without further sorting. Newspaper, junk mail, and corrugated cardboard could go in another. My responsibilities were freshly defined, my commitment to responsible recycling strengthened.

How apropos, then, to be ruminating on garbage as election results rolled in. Perhaps President Bush has indeed has his sign from Above, his guiding principles sent more from Heaven than gleaned from the harsh realities of earth. What’s good enough for the leader of the free world is good enough for me: now I know that my interest in recycling was positively prescient. I am suddenly awash in a world where recycling seems like the lay of the land, rather than one’s weekly duty. Maybe we are indeed out of new narratives, recycling the same stories, this time as a nation.

Consider—we’ve recycled an administration. There will be some churning and changeover, and we’ll have the Bush Administration anew. The nation may even be witness to—or caught within—the recycling of a family’s dreams and Freundin dramas, as George W. surpasses his father’s electoral success and military endurance. Sex and love seem to be on the political table in a way those topics haven’t been since the 1960s: we’ve cycled through Free Love to Legislative Lovers, it seems. There’s an ominous Other abroad, a Middle-Eastern face as chilly as any Cold War Russian mug. Infiltration could happen anywhere, at any time. My children in the fine art of scrambling under their desks, but we’ve bought gas masks in record numbers. Protest music of the sixties—all guitar and voice and sad lament—has been replaced by Eminem’s jabs and the voice of hip-hop. Young people demonstrate on college campuses and the guiding voice and sad lament—is now三个 stories, dreams, ideologies and fears—oh, and don’t forget the tangible stuff we set out on the curb.

Don’t forget: curbside recycling has changed! Recycle into two categories: papers and bottles/cans. All paper (newspaper, cardboard, junk mail, cereal boxes, etc.) goes into one pile. Flattened plastic bottles (not take out containers or yogurt tubs), steel and aluminum cans, and glass bottles go in another. Don’t waste your time sorting things further, as the trucks only sort in those two categories; the rest of the sorting is done at the plant! Flatten those milk bottles, please. Need additional blue bins? Call the Dayton’s Bluff District Council at 772-2075. Questions? Thank goodness for Eureka’s Recycling Hotline: 651-222-7678.

Chapter 5: The 1860s and early 1870s

The home construction and business in general in the Dayton’s Bluff area increased during the 1860s and early 1870s. People began building homes and businesses beyond the edge of the bluff. Most of the houses were still within what has been called “the walking city,” but a few people ventured further out, relying on horse drawn carriages to get them to town and back. William Branch was among those who dwelt in what were called “country estates.” The two came from Rhode Island in 1857 and bought a plot of four acres from Lyman Dayton, being a bookkeeper and selling real estate. According to a contemporary it was “a very lovely and desirable home” and “one of the beautiful residences of the city.”

An 1886 historian described William as a “slender man, unpretentious… Very conscientious in his beliefs, and always anxious to do right.” The grounds around the Wakefieldes had adorned their area with “beautiful trees, and it is a very lovely and very desirable place.”

This two story early Italianate frame house was constructed sometime around 1860, though the exact date is uncertain. “What Cheer Lawn,” as they called their home, sat in the middle of what was once a beautifully land-scape lawn that was surrounded by a high board fence in later years.

The recently restored house still stands at 963 Wakefield—the street name was changed from Birch in 1892. One of its unique features is the fact that it sits at an angle to the sidewalk and other homes. This is because it was built to face the old Territorial Road which crossed today’s grid pattern.

In 1860 a man named William Branch built a house at the northeast corner of today’s Bates and Wilson. “A medium-sized man, cool and collected, possessed of a remarkable ability,” as one writer described him, he was originally a mason or a carpenter by trade. In either case, he ended up a contractor for large jobs such as grading the first forty miles of the Superior and Mississippi Railroad that ran below Dayton’s Bluff.

Branch was interested in politics and had been part of the Territorial Legislatures that shaped the outlines of the city council from 1856 until 1861 and simultaneously served as a county commissioner in 1858 and 1859. Branch was elected to the State legislature in 1866.

When Branch died at the age of 50, his obituary said he “did not have the advantages of much education when young,” but was “endowed by nature with a great deal of [of] shrewdness, hard common sense, practical judgment and business sense.” According to an 1880’s writer, “he owned a home on Dayton’s Bluff, and in his former grounds his body now repos.”

An 1864 newspaper notice of Branch’s activities reveals the exist-ence of two other outlying residences. Discussing the fact that Branch had removed the deserted twin of the first twenty miles of the Superior Railroad, it noted that the route ran from downtown along the west bank of “Phelan’s Creek.” It then followed the natural grade “and then meets up with Dr. Patterson’s Villa in the prairie.”

As the line continued, it ran about a hundred yards in front of Dr. Post’s residence. “Then came the line of Earl and East Sevenths — and then follows along the Stillwater road for a mile.” It crossed the creek four different times. “It seems,” the paper concluded, “as if the valley of Phelan’s Creek were just made for such a road.”

While it is relatively easy to find mentions of houses from this era, detailed descriptions are rare. One of the best features the home of H. L. Dowman, who built an elegant home on the bluff in 1872. Originally from Prairie du Chien, he was a partner in the American Fur Company. A Mill-waukee paper wrote the following ex-hortation:

“The building is of liberal propor-tions covering an area of some 5,000 square feet, and will be of two lofty stories, divided into chambers, with ample dressings rooms, bath rooms, & etc., attached. The lofty… story in the roof was devoted to servants’ rooms and storage.

“From this floor a spiral iron stair-way will run to the apex of the lower roof. The house will be warmed by a gas heater and there will be supplied and a system of ventilation introduced, and of course all modern appliances for comfort and elegance are provided for. The building will be substantially fireproof and very thoroughly built.

“The exterior walls are to be of brick, dressed liberally with cut stone for caps, sills, belts, cornices and or-naments, and the roof will be of slate. The casings and interior wood work being of dark, rich native woods, and the walls harmoniously tinted, to cor-respond with in tone, and the ceilings frescoed. Each room will be furnished in the style of the building is a modi-fication of the medieval domestic ar-chitecture now somewhat used by our more educated architects, as embody-ing most of the requirements for taste and convenience, where a liberal ex-penditure is allowed.”

Descriptions of daily life in the 1860s and 1870s are also hard to find. But a biographer of James J. Hill, the rail-road baron, was able to dig up informa-tion that sheds some light on the matter, although it may not be typical.

For a short time, the Hill family lived in the neighborhood. They were wait-ing for the completion of a home in Lowertown and stayed in Dayton’s Bluff from 1876 to 1877. They resided in what a son called “a country place.” It was a roomy stone structure of white brick that stood on seven acres in today’s Mounds Park area. The out-buildings included a horse barn, cow barn, chicken house and icehouse, and there was a large garden.

“Perhaps the liveliest use of open land was grading city,” but a few people ventured ing city,” but a few people ventured to do right.”

The 1860s and early 1870s brought important changes to Dayton’s Bluff. More elegant homes and numerous smaller residences began to fill the land-scape. The area’s development even af-fected one of the venerable neighborhood landmarks. In July 1869, the St. Paul Daily Press had a headline that read “Digging off the Bluff.” According to the article, ground had been bawfully engaged digging off Dayton’s Bluff, and grading just below the track of the St. Paul and Chicago Railway.

Another source said that a canal had “condemned for their use the strip of land along the river bank” which included the “cliff in which is the cave.” The writer commented, “It has destroyed it. “But a shallow cavity now remains to mark its site. The pool or lake is gone,” the writer commented, “and the limpid stream that flows through it now supplies a railroad tank. Its poetry and romance are destroyed by the necessities of modern travel and material growth.”

Give the gift that keeps on growing - a tree

The gift of a tree is a unique and car- ing way to recognize any special occa-sion. For that special someone, the hard to buy for business associate, or to commemorate a special occasion. The Friends of the Parks and Trails of St. Paul and Ramsey County, a Minne-sota nonprofit, make it easy to do your shopping. No gift-wrap is involved and your gift is purchased, the Friends will send a notice next spring on when to pick up the tree in Saint Paul.

The second option is to purchase a tree that is given directly to the recipient. In addition to sending a card when the tree gift is purchased, the Friends will send a notice announcing your gift will be sent by the Friends to the recipient. The gift will be enjoyed and appreciated for years to come. The gift can be given in two ways.

The first option is to purchase a tree that is given directly to the recipient. In addition to sending a card when the tree gift is purchased, the Friends will send a notice next spring on when to pick up the tree in Saint Paul.

The second option is to have a tree planted in a local park in honor of the recipient or occasion. Most parks in Dakota and Ramsey Counties are eligible for trees. When you purchase a tree card, the Friends will notify the recipi-ent of the exact location of the tree after it is planted in 2006. The tree cost is $50.00 each. Send a check to the Friends of the Parks, 1621 Beechwood Ave., St. Paul, MN 55116. Include the name and address of the person you wish to receive the card. Be sure to list how the donor should be named on the card, whether the tree is for the recipient or for a park (designate the park). For more information or an order form call 651-698-454 or check the Friend’s web site at www.friendsoftheparks.org.

Marian Center was once again transformed into the Land of Oz

It was a real treat to see the HealthEast Care Center & Residence – Marian of St. Paul transformed into the Land of Oz. Several hundred children turned out for the seventh annual Halloween event on Thursday, Oct. 28. It’s become a tradition on St. Paul’s East Side every Halloween. “More than 600 children came from all over St. Paul,” said Jeff Thorne, Administrator at HealthEast Care Center & Residence – Marian of St. Paul. “This holiday tradition just keeps getting bigger and better each year.”

The children, who were dressed in their favorite costumes, walked down the yellow brick road collecting treats from the residents, some dressed in Halloween costumes themselves. The kids followed the yellow brick road down to the Land of Oz. Their eyes opened wide and they were all smiles when they walked in and saw Dorothy, the Tin Man, the good witch Glenda and all the other characters from the Wizard of Oz.

Staff, volunteers and residents look forward to decorating the facility every year and dressing up like characters from the Wizard of Oz. They recreate Dorothy’s house, the cornfield with the scarecrow and of course, Oz. A special thanks goes out to the wonderful volunteers and staff who spent countless hours in setting up this annual event.

It’s a Halloween tradition on St. Paul’s East Side that the seniors look forward to as much as the kids.

Best Dayton’s Bluff garden of 2004

By Karin DuPaul

The winners of the 2004 Dayton’s Bluff Garden Contest are Sandy and Frank Ritter, Conway Street residents who have been gardening in Dayton’s Bluff for over 30 years. Their three children attended Dayton’s Bluff Elementary and Harding High School. The Ritter’s gardens were nominated by a number of people, including two people who do not live in Dayton’s Bluff. About 12 years ago they expanded their gardens into the lot next door. When the condemned house next door was torn down, they purchased the lot. Since that time they turned a muddy vacant lot into a beautiful multitude of plants. They also have a number of very nice sitting areas great for entertaining, a beautiful pond, bonfire ring, lots of yard art, and space for the family dogs, Rosey and Storm.

Their gardens are a combination of vegetable, fruit and flowering plants. Fruit trees include apple, plum and peach. They eat and can the fruits. Their peaches are delicious and their canned peaches with brandy and cinnamon are outstanding. They also grow raspberries and strawberries. This year they planted 28 tomato plants; many bearing huge tomatoes. They have 25 rose bushes in many beautiful colors. Some of their other flowering plants include daffodils, tulips, peonies, hostas, bleeding hearts and many kinds of lilies. The layout of the gardens and the colors are outstanding. Next summer we are planning to have the Ritter’s garden on one of our neighborhood garden tours.

The Garden Contest is a project of Greening Dayton’s Bluff and the Greenspace Committee of the Dayton’s Bluff District 4 Community Council. A special thanks goes to the judges of the garden contest. To get involved with these groups call Karin at 651-772-2075.

Before the woodlands of this area became Dayton’s Bluff, plentiful vegetation and wildlife had sustained human life here for generations. The local Mdewakanton Dakota hunted deer, buffalo, beaver, and other fur-bearing animals. They used parts of these animals for medicinal purposes, ate the meat, and preserved the hides for use as shelter and clothing. Their hunting skills and the wealth of resources at their command attracted the interests of European fur traders.

Tall wide brimmed hats worn by Swedish military officers were the inspiration for the fashion craze that made the fur trade so lucrative. These hats, which were crafted from fur felt, became popular among status-conscious men in Western Europe during the late 15th century. The most dashing styles were trimmed with flowing ostrich feathers; the more practical tri-cornered, the more dignified top hats, later bowlers and cowboy hats were all popular during various periods of the fur trade. Through a labor-intensive process that required large amounts of water and the neurotoxin mercury oxide, a four-pound stack of pelts could be reduced to a quantity of felt sufficient to make a single fur hat.

Beaver fur, because of its unique natural qualities that make it especially suitable for compressing into soft water-resistant mats, was the most popular material for hatters. The damsel and aquatic rodent with long front teeth, webbed hind feet, a paddle-like tail, and thick brown fur was once plentiful throughout northern Asia and Europe, but by the 16th century beaver had been hunted to near extinction in the eastern side of the Atlantic Ocean.

When Europeans began to arrive in North America around 1500, they discovered a fresh supply of beaver and other fur pelts that could bring high prices in European markets. They began to trade manufactured items like the textiles, tools, and guns they had brought with them from home for pelts supplied by Native Americans. Beaver pelt coats that had been worn by Native Americans for at least one season were especially sought after. Wearing the coat with the fur side next to the body eventually caused the longer hairs to fall out of the pelt, leaving only the soft under-fur that hatters preferred. For a time, pelts served as a form of currency.

The intense competitive fur trade rapidly changed the face of North America. Between 1754 and 1773, the British Army fought the French and their Native American allies for possession of the northern lands east of the Mississippi. This conflict, known as the French and Indian War, resulted in a British victory that unseated France as the principal force on the supply of pelts and trade and the fur companies competed in the area in which we now live to the British. Jonathan Carver, who had served as a British army captain during the French and Indian War, famously visited this area in 1766 to assess its potential for supplying pelts. By that time, local Dakota bands had been engaged in the fur trade for at least 100 years.

Although the French had dominated the early period of the North American fur trade and colonial settlers had established their own hat-making operations, most of the pelts gathered during the height of the fur trade were shipped to hatters in Great Britain. Benjamin Franklin successfully exploited this apparent imbalance when he visited France in 1775. He charmed the Parisians with his rustic American ways and forged a military alliance that proved invaluable to the Yankees during the Revolutionary War. Before embarking on this diplomatic mission, Franklin put on a coonskin cap and left his tri-corner hat at home.

Ten years after Carver’s visit, control of the fur trade began to shift again. The colonies of New England won their independence from King George in 1776 and in 1819 the United States established Fort Snelling on the west side of the Mississippi. Under Fort Snelling’s protection, the area directly across the river became the major fur-trading town of Mendota. By the 1830s, over-hunting and deforestation were fueling ethnic rivalries and competition for the dwindling supply of pelts in this increasingly populous area. Just down stream, the Mdewakanton village of Kapopsia relocated to the river’s west bank and a retired French fur trader known as Pig’s Eye took up near their former residence with his still. The city of St. Paul was incorporated in 1847.

The man in the photo, identified only as a mixed blood fur trader, is wearing a cap made of a single pelt used almost whole. Less refined than hats made of felt, fur caps like these had come to represent the American spirit of independence. But by the 1870s, significant declines in North American beaver populations on both sides of the Mississippi were signaling the end of an era. Years of unmanaged fur harvesting combined with the loss of natural habitat to logging, agriculture, and urban development had driven the beaver to the edge of extinction on a third continent.

Tanya Johnson - a political artist

By J. Wittenberg

It was a fine autumnal day when I met the Dayton’s Bluff artist named Tanya Johnson. The sun was out and all seemed right with the world. The view from the Bluff was fine as the sun hinted at closing out the day in dramatic fashion.

Alas, Ms. Johnson was feeling “gloomy” from the recent election results and who could blame her. Happily, after a time, she found some solace in her own Betty McCollum once again winning the day. A lone bright spot, we both agreed, and at least one victory for decency. Ms. Johnson found it curious that with all the mean-spiritedness and selfishness so prevalent in today’s politics, that someone who has done so much good for so many should actually prevail in an election! We both agreed – will wonders ever cease?

Such topics were acutely apropos, as Ms. Johnson makes much in the way of political art. Only recently this Dayton’s Bluff artist has shown her work upon the walls of the Minneapolis Institute of Art, as part of their ongoing dramatic political exhibit. Ms. Johnson lamented how conserverative our state has been leaning, so contrary to how historically progressive our state has traditionally been with figures like Humphrey, Mondale, and Wellstone. She mused upon our late, great senator and said: “We’ll never have another like him. He could have used him now, more than ever…in these terrible times, where social programs, after-school programs, the arts, and empathy are being hung out to dry. But I guess these are not moral enough.”

In gazing at some of Ms. Johnson’s collage work, I may discern how dark these last four years have been to her and to many, and where as far as the eye may see, one may take no joy. In her faces there are eyes and mouths burned or scorched out. These are images that predict a day of reckoning. Indeed, they speak of censorship and intolerance. Besides found images, her collages include charcoal and acrylic paint. Upon the wall, with all the other art so crammed on display, I feel her work would be better served in being seen all by itself, away from the deluge surrounding it.

Ms. Johnson is self-taught and is not overly keen on promoting herself. Indeed, I approached her upon learning she was from Dayton’s Bluff. Presently, her work is not for sale, but one can take home a feeling of the despair that has come over many of our citizens over the last four years. “Thankfully, a person’s right for free expression is still relatively intact. But there are other rights which may soon be slipping away,” Ms. Johnson said. Her work holds a powerful message, one which is being seen, and deservedly so. Of her own creations, Ms. Johnson said, “It does not predict a bright future, but perhaps it can bring some awareness and hope that wholesale sale-change is so important to remove us from the downward course on which some have so recklessly desired to take us.”

Dayton’s Bluff teacher receives national award

It’s not every day that U.S. Education Secretary Rod Paige sends someone to a teacher’s classroom to express gratitude for a job well done.

But that’s exactly what happened to Brandon Phillips early this fall when Kristine Cohn, a regional representative for the U.S. Department of Education, stopped by Dayton’s Bluff Achievement Academy to tell him that he’s been named an American Star of Teaching.

“It’s very nice to have your work recognized by the U. S. Department of Education,” said Phillips. “But the real reward is being able to help my students learn and grow.”

The award is an effort by national education leaders to recognize effective classroom teachers who are successful in improving the academic performance of their students, and are making a real difference in their students’ lives.

A colleague nominated Phillips for the award, and he is the only Minnesota teacher recognized. American Stars of Teaching have been identified in every state and the District of Columbia.
