Happy Birthday, Lyman Dayton

The sounds of “Happy Birthday, Lyman Dayton” rang out near Third Street and Mounds Boulevard at the end of August. In spite of the damp weather, a small but spirited group of neighborhood residents, some of whom are shown in the photo above, were celebrating the 194th birthday of the man for whom the area is named.

It was the inaugural event of what is hoped to be a series sponsored by the recently formed Dayton’s Bluff Heritage and Happiness Club. The activity took place on the grounds of what used to be the Lyman and Maria Dayton home, located in the empty lot above Mounds Boulevard between 3rd Street and Conway. Those who showed up shared potato salad and other food, swapped stories and discussed plans for future gatherings. Other communities have large, well-attended festivals. Dayton’s Bluff used to, and it is hoped that get-togethers such as this might spark an interest in re-starting the “Festival on the Bluff” or some similar event in the future.

Mounds Park pavilion party

As most of you know, the historic prairie style pavilion at Earl and Mounds Boulevard in the heart of Mounds Park has undergone major renovation and people can once again go in the handsome brick structure. The work has been completed for some time, but there has never been any event to mark the work that has been done.

That’s why the Dayton’s Bluff Heritage and Happiness Committee has announced the second in its series of neighborhood celebrations—the “Pavilion in the Park Party.” It will be held on Tuesday, October 12th, which by happenstance is also (or used to be) “Columbus Day.” It will start around 6:00 p.m. and go until dusk.

Everyone is welcome. It will be a potluck, so please bring a dish or two to pass. You will also need to provide your own plates, blankets or chairs, etc. People are encouraged to bring guitars or other instruments for an impromptu talent show. If there is interest, there may also be a short Mounds Park history walking tour.

Let’s have a good turn out for what will probably be the last outdoor event until spring. For more information call Karin DuPaul at 772-2075, or just show up at the pavilion. Reservations are not necessary.

A Short History of Dayton’s Bluff

Chapter 3: The Confluence of Cultures

Popular media often portrays the interactions between Native Americans and European traders and settlers. However, researchers have looked more carefully at the evidence and found that there was usually a time during which the power relationships were generally balanced and interactions were mutually beneficial.

Historians use the term “Middle Ground” to describe this short-lived era. With fairly equal power, relationships were usually friendly and mutually beneficial. The people of Kaposia — the Mdewakanton band of the Dakota — generally welcomed the new settlers and traded with them and frequently visited the frontier city of St. Paul.

The “Middle Ground” period in the St. Paul area usually extended from the 1830s to the late 1840s. But what is the reality behind the academic label? Who were the people who lived in the bend of the Mississippi? What were they doing? What did they do? How did different cultures get along? Answers to these questions are hard to find, but examining the available biographical information provides some idea of the residents and their interactions.

The social relations included romance and as a result there was some intermarriage. The mixed blood population came to be called the Metis and their culture was a combination of European-usually French-and Indian. One of the most well known Metis was Joseph Renville, who was born in Kaposia in 1779 to a Dakota mother and French trader.

Renville was educated by a priest in Canada and his ability to read and write several languages let him work with a variety of people. He first worked for an English fur company, traveling and buying furs and living in Kaposia during the winter. He helped found the Columbia Fur Company in 1822 and when it was purchased by the American Fur Company he went to western Minnesota.

As an officer with a contingent from Kaposia, Renville fought in the War of 1812. They were on the British side. As an officer with a contingent from the British, he went to Kaposia during the winter. He brought back the fine deer! There was plenty of all kinds, Plums and Apples in abundance. Strawberries and blueberries are also plenty in their time.

William Evans, a native of Ireland, may have been the first European resident of the community. Around 1838, upon his discharge from his soldiering, one source stated, he took up a claim on top of the bluff. Evans, his wife, and her five children from a previous marriage lived in a cabin overlooking the river on “one of the most desirable sites for a dwelling about St. Paul.”

Another person was more specific, suggesting that the Evans family located north of today’s Seventh Street. Evans seemed to have been fairly prominent in early city life. For instance, in the 1840s, Evans was elected one of three commissioners who would “survey and locate” a road from St. Paul to St. Anthony. In July 1842 he was one of a group selected to lay out a road from his farm to the St. Croix River at Stillwater.

According to one pioneer writer, they “lived happily a number of years on the bluff when they sold the claim to Lyman Dayton.”

1849: Goodhue reports on the Bluff

Pioneer Press, September 19, 1849

“Turning around Robert’s corner at the lower landing, we pass down through a heavy growth of timber, cross Trout Brook, and McLeod’s Creek finding the good path for a horse, most of the way. Ascending upon the first table above the river, we come suddenly, upon the grounds of the Indian Encampment, which has been the site of an advantageous country. We have ever lived in the soil can’t be beat for Wheat and Potatoes and all kinds of vegetables. Wild fruit is plenty of all kinds, Plums and Apples in abundance. Strawberries and blueberries are also plenty in their time.”

Mississippi in exchange for promises of food and cash annuities. Big Thunder, Kaposia’s leader, headed a Native American delegation that signed the final agreement in Washington D.C. in September 1837. Kaposia was then moved to the west side of the Mississippi. Even before the treaty was signed, European settlers were starting to encroach on Native American land. On June 9, 1837, a delegation from Kaposia came to Fort Snelling and complained to Major Taliaferro, the Indian agent, that that people were moving into the Dakota territory before the treaty had been ratified.

Years later a man named Isaac LaBissoniere confirmed that as early as 1836, a few people had illegally squatted along the river below Dayton’s Bluff. LaBissoniere—sometimes spelled Labisiner—was born in Pembina in 1823. His father was a Canadian fur trader who married a Dakota woman. Sometime around 1837 the family settled on the bottomland near the old state fish hatchery where Isaac was born in 1842. There was no official survey, so they just put up a sign saying the land had been claimed. They lived there for eleven years.

In an interview given to the St. Paul Dispatch when he was in his eighties, LaBissoniere described what seemed to be a subsistence life style. “Why should we work? Nobody had to work by Jimminy. The morning I got out, I shoot the duck, the quail, the Prairie chicken! The family they tire themselves of the birds, I go over on Dayton’s Bluff, near Mouseau’s and I bring back the fine deer! There was berries, too, and we could buy flour whenever we much need him.”

The man mentioned by LaBissoniere was Charles Moussoa—sometimes spelled Moussoa-native of Canada. At the age of 20, he came to Minnesota in 1827 or 1829 to work for the American Fur Company. Moussoa married a woman named Fanny Perry at Ft. Snelling in 1836 and in the fall of 1838 or spring of 1839 made a claim in Dayton’s Bluff. After that he farmed and made a living doing carpentry work. The family sold their claim to Eben Weld in 1848 and moved to Hennepin County.

Eben Weld was a prominent man in the early history of the community. In fact, when a newspaper editor mentioned the area where he and others resided in 1849, it was referred to as “Weld’s Bluff.” He was born in New Hampshire in 1815 and as a young man ran a fur trading post near La Crosse, Wisconsin. Able to speak Dakota, Weld was appointed as the agricultural teacher at Kaposia under the provisions of the 1837 treaty. Weld is one of the few of the earliest settlers of our neighborhood whose papers are preserved. In a letter to relatives, he said, “Taking everything into consideration this is the most advantageous country I have ever lived in. The soil can’t be beat for Wheat and Potatoes and all kinds of vegetables. Wild fruit is plenty of all kinds, Plums and Apples in abundance. Strawberries and blueberries are also plenty in their time.”

The Clothes Line –

Ghosts in my closet

By Sarah Ryan

Determined to clean out the closet, I grasp the doorknob firmly. Suddenly I’m on the floor with what feels like a dislocated elbow and a broken tailbone. Before I can get up, I’m rushed by a mob of ghosts wearing my old clothes. Demonstrating and disorganized, some of them shout slogans like, “Get Rid of Me Now!” and “Burn the Photos!” Others hold up signs: “You Can’t Let Go!” “I’m Staying Put!” and “We Remember!”

As they begin to chant in unison, I cover my head with my hands. “Where are we going to go? Where are we going to go?”

Then I’m in Paris. The year is 1292, and I’m a tax collector. I think, “I’m not a tax collector. And I don’t speak French. What am I doing here?” But it’s only a dream so I play along and glance at the papers in my hand. There are 366 shoemakers, 214 furriers, 197 tailors, 86 weavers, 54 hat makers, 45 purse makers, 24 tanners, and 21 glove makers. “Ah, here they are,” I hear myself say as my finger comes to rest at the bottom of the list. “43 laundresses and 121 registered old clothes dealers.” My ears start ringing and I think, “Ice cream truck! Impossible. It’s October and the earth is flat. Alarm clock? No. It’s only — what time is it?”

Saturday afternoon. I wake with a start. The book about “Life in a Medieval City” that I got from Marty’s Second Hand Store for a dollar falls to the floor as I sit up on the couch and scramble for the phone. Wrong number. I rub my eyes, shake my head, and notice three piles of clothes in the hall: the ones that don’t fit, the ones that would really look better on someone else, and the ones that I just can’t bear to get rid of, like the pink sweater I’ve worn every winter for at least the past decade that my grandmother bought at a garage sale before I was born. As I get off the couch, I trip over a roll of plastic garbage bags. Darn cat.

A recent conversation with friends convinced me that I’m not the only one with ghosts in my closet. Lou was complaining about the expense of having to have his suit altered for an upcoming wedding. “Just buy one that fits at a local thrift store,” I suggested. “Then you only have to pay for cleaning.” He said his wife had admitted that he just doesn’t feel comfortable wearing “some dead guy’s clothes.”

“Don’t be so squeamish,” I said. “How do you know the suit came from a dead guy? Maybe it just didn’t fit anymore. But if you don’t want to wear it after the wedding, just donate it back to the thrift store.” We all felt a little uncomfortable when Phyllis, whose mother recently passed away, said she’s heard that sometimes clothing donated to second hand stores is shredded for rags before anyone has a chance to wear it again.

Clothing often has sentimental value, and that can make closets hard to clean. Well-constructed garments can easily out-live their makers, their wearers, and the styles or purposes they were made to serve. One way or another, old clothes are almost always re-incarnated: looking just the way you remember them but on someone else’s body, as reclaimed fiber in a form you’d never recognize, or even as the electricity that lights the bulb in the hallway in front of your closet. When you’re ready to exorcise the ghosts from your closet, there’s help. The newest recycling choice for clean, reusable items. Local consignment stores like TurnStyle will accept donations of clean, bagged clothing and paired shoes for resale in developing countries (where, it seems, many of my clothes and shoes were made). For curbside pick-up, contact the Disabled American Veterans, the Epilepsy Foundation, or the Lupus Foundation. If you prefer, deposit your clothing to be sold at a local thrift store. The Animal Arc, Salvation Army, Goodwill, St. Vincent De Paul, Unique, and Savers stores all accept clean, reusable items. Local consignment stores like TurnStyle will pay you for your best clothes if they can sell them and return them to you if they can’t.

As I bleed the radiators, I’m thinking, “Now what did I do with that old pink sweater?” Sarah Ryan lives in Dayton’s Bluff. You can reach her by e-mail at sarah@lakecast.com or send garments to the Dayton’s Bluff District Forum office, 798 E. 7th Street, 55106.

Sacred Heart School Celebrates 50th reunion

The Little Oven on Minnehaha and White Bear Avenue was the venue for the gathering of twenty-six of the 64 classmates of the Class of 1954 from Sacred Heart Grade School. For many, it was the first time since their 8th grade graduation ceremony that they had seen each other.

The evening was spent reliving old memories, catching up on current lives and getting reconnected. Letters from former classmates and teachers were also a highlight of the evening. Although many still live in the area, class attendees came from as far as Arizona for the reunion. Old pictures and memorabilia were the highlight of the evening in addition to lots of picture taking.

The Committee starting gathering names last fall and had a wonderful time planning for the group’s arrival on August 21. Many thanks to the planners for initiating the process and bringing the group together.

If other classes of Sacred Heart, St. Casimir, St. Patrick or St. John are interested in planning a reunion, they can contact the Alumni Office at Trinity Catholic School, the consolidation of these schools, at 651-776-2763 x. 249. It’s time to start planning for the classes of 1955 and 1980.

My summer vacation in Sturgis

By Karin DuPaul, Community Organizer

On August 6th we started our pilgrimage to the Sturgis Bike Rally in the Black Hills of South Dakota. We took US 212 to get there so that we could stop and visit some of my relatives on the way. West of the Missouri River the towns are farther apart and there are more and higher hills.

We stopped at a gas station/restaurant in Selby, South Dakota. Lots of people came out of the building and stood in small groups in the parking area. It turns out they were approximately fifty farmers from Australia who were here to learn about farming in the United States. We came across a town named Lantry. I had to stop and take a picture of the sign to send it to our city council person Kathy Lantry. Then we left US 212 and headed into Sturgis. The closer we got the more motorcycles we were seeing. The business streets in Sturgis were lined with vendors selling all kinds of motorcycle related wares. Thousands of motorcycles parked along the street and people were everywhere.

All of the Black Hills area caters to the motorcycle visitors. Main Street in Deadwood does not allow parking on it except during the Rally. Hundreds of motorcycles line both sides of the street. A number of towns with wide main streets allow motorcycles to park a row in the middle of the street as well as along the curb. Many places in and near the Black Hills double the cost of lodging during the Rally. During the Rally all the lodging was full.

Our second day we had to put together our screen tent. We started to put it up and seven people from a nearby campsite came over to help us. It was up in no time. These people are from a rural community in Iowa and all work in law enforcement. There were two sheriff deputies, one running for County Sheriff, 2 EMS and a 911 operator. We had some interesting conversations about law enforcement and the difference between city and small towns. In their rural community the night shift is very slow.

This year during the Sturgis Rally an estimated 514,951 people attended; 705.87 tons of garbage were generated; 133 marriage licenses were issued; 863 vendor licenses were issued in Sturgis; 222 vendor licenses were issued in Meade County; and there were four Rally related deaths in South Dakota, according to the Rally Newsletter.

We put 1,300 miles on the motorcycle during the time we were in the Black Hills.

The beauty of the Black Hills is even more beautiful on a motorcycle. It is a wonderful experience riding along the road up and down and around on a motorcycle.

As the Rally ended, the sound of motorcycles was replaced by the sight of RV’s flled with families climbing the hills.

My summer vacation in Sturgis when this many motorcycles park on Main Street in Sturgis, South Dakota, it can only mean one thing: it’s time for the annual Sturgis Bike rally.
A Mounds Theatre Ghost Story

By R.A.R.

There are many stories concerning the ghostly residents that seem to have made their home at the old Mounds Theatre located at 1029 Hudson Road in Saint Paul, MN. In all, there are three known encounters, one of which on opening night skips glibly across the stage, bouncing a small rubber ball; a middle aged man, who moves around the projection booth, seemingly distracted by some forgotten event; and an usher, dressed in a red uniform, who continues to direct people to their designated seats in the traditional order of the auditorium.

The story I’m about to tell is an actual account of my encounter with two of them. However there are many more experiences that are now etched permanently in my mind. Take note, it is immaterial to me whether you do or do not believe in ghosts, as I know in my mind that they DO exist. In reading the following account you have to judge for yourself.

After her opening the door I walked cautiously into the darkness over to the light switch on the wall in the ticket office. I turned on the light and I stood in the eerie glow of days gone by. I had just entered the Mounds Theatre, a 1920’s silent movie house famous throughout the 1940’s.

Sidestepping the rubble on the lobby floor I made my way to the entrance of the main auditorium. As my hand touched the door’s cold metal handle, the hairs on my neck stood up. What was waiting for me through this small single door no one could say.

Slowly the door creaked open revealing the piles of debris that had accumulated over the last 40 years, all of which was piled high on the tattered, dusty theater seats.

After my eyes became accustomed to the dim lighting, I made my way down the aisle of the main auditorium. There were empty popcorn boxes on the floor along with various candy boxes strewn throughout the seats, sitting as they did when the doors of the theater were hurriedly closed in the late 1960s. I had to wonder: why did the last owner slam the doors and leave in such a hurry? It was all very curious.

As I stood in the small theater aisle my breathing suddenly became labored. The air rushing into my lungs was now thick and musty and I found myself thinking. As I became accustomed to the stale air, I surveyed the mounds of “treasures” piled high by the present owner who had been using the theater as a warehouse for the last 40 years. I forced myself to walk and proceeded down the aisle, making mental notes of the theater’s contents. There were old organ manuals — hundreds of them, piled high, one on top of the other. Old boxes were strewn about piles of debris that had accumulated over the last 40 years, all of which was piled high on the tattered, dusty theater seats.

My gaze now fell on the stage. The old, yellowing projection screen hung tattered and torn from its riggings in the ceiling. Small pieces of the black masking appeared to be moving through some unforeseen force. With my gaze transfixed on the movie screen I could see the vague outline of a person, but I’m sure it was only my eyes playing tricks on me... or was it?

It was then I heard it. Something or someone appeared to be skipping across the back of the stage behind the rows of computers. I was now so straining to see if there was someone else in the building. Logic however told me that this wasn’t possible as there was only myself and one other entrance to the building. The skipping finally stopped abruptly and I heard a ball bouncing down the back stairs connected to the stage. First one step and then two and then total silence. I looked down and at my feet was a small rubber ball. My immediate reaction told me to move but I was now so tense... I moved, my feet feeling like lead weights attached to my legs, which were now starting to tremble.

The skipping sound brought me back to reality and my gaze again was transfixed back to the stage. There I saw a young girl, possibly six or seven, dressed in a pink gauze dress that seemed to float around her as if a slight, unseen breeze was moving the transparent material slowly around her body. It appeared as a pale pink mist. Her hair hung in golden rings, bobbing up and down in the light shining on the doors making the door at the opposite end of the stage. She then stopped suddenly, turning to look at me. Her crystal blue eyes locked onto mine and I stared open mouthed, trying to tell myself something, as the ache in her eyes was truly evident. She then vanished from sight as if swallowed up in the black abyss waiting to engulf her.

After regaining my composure I stood for a while in the darkness, not knowing what to believe what I had just seen and heard. Who was this young lady and why had she chosen to reveal herself to me? I then looked down at my watch, knowing full well that I had only been standing there for a short amount of time. But I was wrong... I had been transfixed in time for a good two hours and knew I had to leave.

I took one more glance over my shoulder to the stage area, hoping to again catch a glimpse of the little girl whose eyes had beseeched me to stay. This was not to be, at least not on this occasion. Turning on my heels, I walked slowly towards the dimly lit exit down the back stairs connected to the stage. The skipping finally stopped... It was not to be, at least not on this occasion.

Before the beginning under the leadership of Ann Lackner, the first program director, the emphasis was on exploring the answers. Parents attended the program had time to experience with one another and with a parent-educator, topics that are always challenging.

How should I discipline? How do I get my child to sleep? Are imaginary friends normal? Why do they always ask why? Will my child ever be potty trained? Parents ask these and many other questions. For thirty years parents in the Early Childhood Family Education Program at Dayton’s Bluff have been exploring the answers.

The beginning years of a child’s life are crucial. Intellectual, physical, social, and emotional growth occur rapidly from birth to age five. In the belief that learning begins at birth, and that parents play the key role in creating a loving, nurturing, learning environment for their children, the Minnesota Legislature in 1974 enacted legislation authored by Senator Jerome Hughes that created six pilot ECFE Programs across the state. This legislation created the first program in the nation designed to support all parents of children from birth to school entrance. One of the six new programs was assigned to a brand new school district—Dayton’s Bluff Elementary where Don Lackner was principal.

A very early video about the Dayton’s Bluff Early Childhood Family Education Program listed a number of the challenges which families faced in the 1970s and concluded, “This program helps!” It still does.
