New business association to host first public event

by Tabitha Benci deRango

On Tuesday, September 14, from 4:00 to 8:00 pm, the new Dayton’s Bluff Business Association (DBBA) will host its first major event. Entitled “Keys to the Community,” it will be held at the Mounds Theatre. The theater is home to Portage for Youth and is a beautifully restored art deco building with a truly cozy setting for socializing. It is located on Hudson Road, a half block west of Earl Street. The purpose of this free event is to introduce you to the businesses that are operating in your area. Also these business entities can network with one another and get an understanding of how they are connected or can apply themselves together.

Exposure for diverse businesses in Dayton’s Bluff

This event is inspired by the fact that many of us tend to seek services and shopping outside our general area and are unaware of the incredible amount of diverse businesses that exist here in Dayton’s Bluff. Browse from booth to booth to take advantage of this unique opportunity to meet local business owners and ask questions about their products and services.

Prizes and raffle

Raffle donations are given by each business and the prizes are amazing! How would you like to win a gift certificate to The Strip Club restaurant, or a massage by Susan Tietjen? How about theater tickets, tool kits, childcare, floral arrangements, Yoga and Karate classes at Midwest Karate? And the list goes on.

Come and bring your neighbors. Enjoy some music, some popcorn, some prizes and some good company. Win prizes and participate in the growth of your community.

Tabitha Benci deRango runs Bluff-side Daycare and is a founding member of DBBA.

STORIES FROM NATIONAL NIGHT OUT

Sherry Johnson—Lower Dayton’s Bluff Block Club

Neighbors turned out to showcase their various cooking talents in our little corner of the bluff. ArtMobile graced us with its presence, helping our little ones with craft spoon puppets. My son still plays with his.

Of course, we also had the regular turnout of law enforcement and emergency services folks. A state senate campaign stopped in, as well.

Altogether, it was an informal, pleasant time of chitchat and community building. Most importantly, I think we might be building toward a bigger party in the fall or spring; we seem to have a great Jamaican-flood aficionado among us!

Sage Holben—4th Street and Bates

This was our second NNO in the almost ten years that I’ve lived on the block. Like last year, it was very well attended. Earlier in the day, adults and children painted a mural in the intersection.

Tug Boat Tony (Dave Wiley) charmed adults and kids with his balloon craft. Almost anything a child could name, Tug Boat Tony could create. Officer Tamam was the first of several police and fire units to visit. Kids loved to examine handcuffs, use the siren and lights, and especially the speaker. From street slang to raspy, low-voiced, “get down on the street, man, right now,” it was better than karaoke for some.

The fire trucks and police vehicles all offered opportunity for kids to climb, ask questions, and pretend. Face painting was contributed by Dayton’s Bluff Rec Center; Niki Rodewald provided hot dogs and hamburgers; Phoenix Market donated juice boxes and Dave Valentine provided soda and water to our large crowd.

Summer garden tours
by Angela DuPaul

Dayton’s Bluff has been showing off its best gardens in a recent series of garden tours. One of the popular tours centered around 4th Street and Bates Avenue. A garden there features a goldfish pond with a short length of pipe where the fish can hide from birds and cats. Another gardener showed how she is coping with this year’s frequent rainfall cascading off the roof. A house on 4th Street featured an intriguing collection of modern garden ornaments. Yet another garden included something unexpected: cacti.
Another tour began at Skidmore Park, a previously little-known city park created in 1884. Situated mid-block on 4th Street between Earl and Hancock streets, the park had no signage and was often missed for a vacant lot. This year neighbors created a community garden by building raised garden beds.

Metropolitan State University sponsors second annual Day of Service

by Harvey Meyer

Underscoring a commitment to community, Metropolitan State University faculty, staff and students will again participate in a day of service benefiting the Dayton’s Bluff neighborhood and beyond.

Officially, Wednesday, September 8, has been designated the university’s second annual United We Serve Day of Service. Metropolitan State’s Center for Community-Based Learning (CCBL) is coordinating the event, which marks a response to President Barack Obama’s 2009 call for Americans to serve the country by volunteering in community-service projects.

“The Day of Service enables our faculty, staff and students to learn more about service opportunities and the organizations that serve Twin Cities-area communities, especially the East Side,” said Ev Rowloff, assistant CCBL director. “In the process, many become more connected with the local community.”

Volunteer opportunities will be available throughout the day at 12 community-service organizations, including nine East Side sites. Projects range from planting community gardens and wildflowers to performing handyman chores to sorting donated books will occur at a variety of sites, including Metropolitan State’s Saint Paul Campus, Books for Africa, East Side community garden sites and Merrick Community Services.

Later in the week, on Friday, Sept. 10, the university will again present “Remembering 9/11,” an event offering opportunities to both reflect on the September 11, 2001, tragedy and the value of community service. Friends and family members of Tom Burnett, Jr., a former Bloomington resident who was killed on 9/11, are scheduled to discuss how they transformed a family tragedy into a legacy that involves educating young people about good citizenship.

The noon event at the Saint Paul Campus auditorium is free and open to the public.

At last year’s Day of Service, 70 faculty, staff and students volunteered their services. Those activities garnered “very positive feedback,” both from the volunteers and the community-service organizations they assisted, said Roloff.

Many of the volunteers offered a helping hand well beyond the Day of Service.

Roloff noted that commitment to community is a founding value at Metropolitan State. In fact, “a demonstrated, unwavering commitment to civic engagement” is enshrined in the university’s vision statement.

“The volunteering done by the university’s faculty, staff and students on the East Side and in Dayton’s Bluff is substantial,” observed Ed Lambert, executive director of the Dayton’s Bluff District 4 Community Council. “They are a reliable and continuous source of committed and creative volunteers, and we appreciate their efforts.”

New housing loan program

by Ed Lambert

District Council executive director

Investing in St. Paul just got a lot easier due to a new housing loan program now available in Dayton’s Bluff and elsewhere in the city.

SHOP (Sustainable Home Ownership Program), a nonprofit mortgage broker, is a revitalized program of the Greater Metropolitan Housing Corporation in partnership with the Dayton’s Bluff Neighborhood Housing Service.

Simpler paperwork

SHOP has now put together in one place a simple and effective way to package a housing purchase loan with a rehab loan, and help homebuyers get into some great properties needing repairs or remodeling. One loan, one closing, one mortgage payment, roll-off, assisted CCBL.

 aldığı “as is,” and close “as is,” yet get professional help to finish the rehab work.

Rehab costs estimates

Purchase/rehab loans have been hard to get, and hard to close on, due to uncertainty about the actual cost of the needed rehab as well as uncertainty about getting the work fully completed and on budget. The mort- gage foreclosure crisis has put lots of good homes on the market, but many are in need of repairs and/or rehab due to the absence of a caring owner.

Prices have come down and buyers are snapping up some great deals; yet the ones needing obvious repairs or rehab have not sold as easily. This new SHOP program enables home-buyers to get at these properties with confidence; and also obtain access to some of the best overall bargains available . . . single-family home purchase/rehab opportunities.

SHOP’s primary mission is to provide high quality mortgage broker services and products to underserved populations and help revitalize low and moderate-income communities—especially those affected by high num- bers of mortgage foreclosures like Dayton’s Bluff. Yet SHOP is a full service mortgage broker, offering a wide variety of mortgage lending programs, including FHA, VA and conventional loans.

Contract for deed available

SHOP also offers affordable housing loans via St. Paul’s City Living program; and have a unique contract for deed program in Dayton’s Bluff that allows a purchase while buyers repair their credit and finances. Once their financial house is in order, the buyers, with SHOP’s help can refinance into a regular mortgage a few years later.

Homeowners who are having prob- lems with their current mortgage can also get guidance, help, and assistance by contacting SHOP. Visit their website www.shop-mortgage.org or call Nicole Doran at 651-793-8906 to get information and applications.

Dayton’s Bluff in the post World War Two Era
by Steve Trimble

As I mentioned in an earlier issue, I’ve been doing research on an article for Ramsey County History. It will look at the history and culture of the Dayton’s Bluff, Railroad Island and lower Payne-Phalen neighborhoods and how they developed into working class enclaves in the 1940s and 50s. It will be published in November, but I thought it might be nice to give a bit of a preview of the things I found for our community during the post-WWII era.

Because there is so much information to cover, this column will primarily focus on the economy and the schools. A lot of what I found was very new to me, and I hope it will be interesting to readers and bring back East Side memories to some of you.

The 1950s were a prosperous time for most of Dayton’s Bluff. With the war restrictions gone, there was a lot of deferred consumer demand. The larger businesses—3M, Seeger/Whirlpool, and Hamm’s Brewery—were expanding and the union jobs they offered were well-paying and stable. It was a community where a family could make a good living even without much formal education, often with only one parent working.

As a result, the neighborhood became increasingly blue collar in its makeup during this era. True, many of the younger residents moved away into new starter homes inside the city or in the nearby developing suburbs. Those who remained behind were happy to live in tight-knit communities that provided almost all of their needs. There were also plenty of jobs in smaller local businesses and institutions. The Klinkerfues Brothers clothing factory at One East 7th Street was flourishing, and the Sanitary Dairy employed large numbers of men and women at a time when milk was still delivered door to door. St. John’s Hospital was also involved in major expansion in the post war era, and there were additions in 1951 and 1959. There were also jobs at nearby railroads and any number of smaller businesses.

One evidence of the general prosperity was the growth of NorthWest Bank, which used to be on East 7th. It had more deposits in the 50s than ever before. In addition, things were getting modernized. According to president Walter Dorle, who was interviewed in 1959, the organization was proud to have recently introduced “electronic banking” for deposits, checking and statements. There was new off street parking. He pointed out that the East Side was one of the few areas that had open land for expansion and this should bring added opportunities for expansion.

To be continued in the October issue of the Forum. Steve Trimble researches and writes about local history.

LatinRaza Services “Sirviendo a los Nuestros”
by Carla Riehle Forum Editor

Giovanna Salerno’s airy offices are a bright spot on the arid stretch of East 7th Street where it meets Duluth Street. Her multi-purpose operation provides tax services, sells insurance, helps with immigration forms, translates documents, provides workers compensation assistance and does payroll for small businesses.

Her offices display memorabilia and pictures of Latin America and she says she chose the name of her company, “LatinRaza Services” to attract Spanish speakers, although she also welcomes many English-speaking clients.

With five employees, LatinRaza seems to have identified a need in the neighborhood. Giovanna is a member of the newly formed Dayton’s Bluff Business Association and is looking forward to working with the organization. Graduating from the University of Phoenix in Miami with a Business Administration major, Giovanna started her business here in 2005.

A native of Peru, she used her office to organize aid for “Ayudada Peru” in 2007, when a massive earthquake struck the country. Two years ago, her office was the site for a mobile Peruvian consulate that was set up as a temporary source for visa processing and the like.

LatinRaza Services is located at 1174 East 7th Street and is open from 9 am to 6 pm Monday through Friday, with longer hours during tax season.

Both performances start at 4:00 pm and are free to the public.

The production, by Mixed Precipitation (www.mixedprecipitation.org), is a dynamic new art form that spices up classic opera with jazz, blues and rock elements and serves it up with chef-prepared local food in small bites throughout the performance. The professional singers and musicians lead the audience from cabbaged patch to herb garden, from scene to scene, in a moveable feast for the eyes, ears, and palate.

Immigration Politics and the East Side
by Peter Rachleff

For more than a century and a half, the East Side has been a center for working class and immigrant politics. Now, facing the challenges posed by the Great Recession and the growth of anti-immigrant politics in Minnesota, it is important that we learn our history and consider its lessons.

Immigrants arriving in the 1800s helped build the East Side

In the middle of the 1800s, immigrants from Ireland, Germany, and Scandinavia settled on the East Side, fleeing bitter poverty, oppression, and political turmoil at home. Pursuing a range of skilled and unskilled work, they built the infrastructure for our urban and industrial development—from bridges, roads, houses, factories and warehouses to digging tunnels and laying railroad track. They also built cultural, religious, and political institutions, from athletic and singing societies to benefit associations, churches and branches of old country political organizations. In the post-Civil War era, these immigrants and their children provided the foundation for the labor movement which consisted not just of unions, but also of cooperatives, reform associations (seeking the eight hour day, for instance), and political organizations. Workers relied on these organizations to help them get through the deep economic depression of 1873-1878, to represent them in dealing with powerful business leaders like James J. Hill and George Pillsbury, and to give them a voice in the direction of American society as a whole.

In the late 1800s and early 1900s, new immigrants arrived on the East Side. While some came from Ireland, Germany, and Scandinavia, more and more came from southern and eastern Europe—Slovakia, Croatia, Romania, Poland, Ukraine, Italy, and Greece. Some even came from Lebanon and Mexico, and they were joined by African-Americans from the U.S. South and Mexican-Americans from Texas. While many spoke different languages and practiced different cultural rituals and different religions from those initial immigrants, they shared the experiences of having fled oppression and poverty, and they, too, were drawn by the Twin Cities economy’s need for manual labor. There was still a need for the construction of infrastructure, and labor was also needed for its repair, for the running of trains, the brewing of beer, and for new industries, such as meat-packing and auto and appliance manufacture. Like their predecessors, they joined unions, took part in strikes, and sought a voice in the political arena.

Immigrants in earlier times seen as “aliens”

While these new immigrants became an integral part of the East Side’s working class in the World War I era, politicians and newspapers accused them of radicalism and disloyalty. Nativism exploded during the war years when Governor Burnquist created the Public Safety Commission and ordered all immigrants to fill out “alien registration forms.” When the economy slid into recession in the early 1920s, some of the immigrants’ working-class neighbors feared for the loss of their jobs and they joined in the intensifying cry for government restriction on further immigration. In 1923-1924, Congress enacted the Johnson-Reid Act which particularly targeted immigrants from southern and eastern Europe, while local employers, schools and social service agencies launched “Americanization” campaigns.

Such interventions actually cemented relationships among working-class East Siders over the course of the 1920s and into the Great Depression of the 1930s. Whatever their national, ethnic, or racial origins, they claimed a shared identity as “hyphenated Americans,” celebrating it at the annual Festival of Nations in Saint Paul.

In the late 1800s and early 1900s, new immigrants arrived on the East Side. While some came from Ireland, Germany, and Scandinavia, more and more came from southern and eastern Europe—Slovakia, Croatia, Romania, Poland, Ukraine, Italy, and Greece. Some even came from Lebanon and Mexico, and they were joined by African-Americans from the U.S. South and Mexican-Americans from Texas. Like their predecessors, they joined unions, took part in strikes, and sought a voice in the political arena.

Last 30 years have put democracy to the test

This democracy has been put to the test in the past thirty years. On the one hand, much of the East Side’s industrial base has been eliminated. Unions have disappeared along with jobs, and the grandchildren of the traditional working class have moved away. The Great Recession of 2008-2010, coming on top of this period of difficult economic change, has posed a serious crisis for our community. Meanwhile, a new wave of immigration has swept into the neighborhood, generated by war (Vietnam, Bonnie, El Salvador, Somalia, Ethiopia, Liberia) and economic globalization (Mexico, Guatemala, the former Soviet Union). Like their predecessors, these new immigrants have sought work and practiced their cultures and rituals. Health-care, the service sector, hotels and restaurants, and the like have sought their labor. When there have been opportunities, they, like their predecessors, have joined unions and sought a political voice.

The new immigrants’ arrival at a time of economic insecurity for other East Siders has made their welcome and integration challenging, not only for them, but for that economic, political, and cultural democracy that earlier generations of East Siders constructed. Given these hard times, we need to remind ourselves of our history, learn from it, and work together to create a new democracy for our present and our future.

Parade of Chicken Coops

With the burgeoning interest in backyard chickens, it was bound to happen—the Twin Cities Parade of Chicken Coops is being held on Saturday, September 11, from 10:00 am-4:00 pm.

Marni Oberpriller, a new urban chicken fancier, is taking part in the届’s Bluff part of the tour and is encouraging her chicken-owning neighbors on East 6th Street to join in.

“If I have two pullets, an Orpington and a Rhode Island Red (and possibly a third on the way), I brought home three four-day-old classroom-hatched chicks back in May. One has since transformed into a rooster that I miss terribly thanks to St. Paul’s no rooster ordinance; he was so fun to play with! Currently he’s living out his dream of being the flamboyant rooster that he is, overseeing a flock in Cottage Grove. Stop by Marni’s coop at 767 East 6th Street during the tour or visit http://sites.google.com/site/twincityescopetour/ for more information and additional sites. If you are raising chickens, you can also sign up as a stop on the tour.

Where in Dayton’s Bluff?

The sharp-eyed winner of the mystery object in last month’s Forum was Gloria Thompson, who correctly identified the plaque on St. John’s church on 5th Street. If you know the location of this month’s mystery object, email karin@daytonsbuff.org or call 651-772-2075. The name of the first person with the correct answer will be printed in next month’s Forum.
There is a new family in Mounds Park and they’ve caused quite a stir
by Jane Prince

“I was standing in my backyard and an eagle soared in feet first, broke a branch off of a dead tree with both feet, and sailed off with it.”

That was one of the first signs that a bald eagle couple had chosen our neighborhood in which to build a nest. Nest building was well underway in early spring of 2009, when the city started a street paving project right beneath the white pine the eagles had chosen. The nest was abandoned for the remainder of last season.

But again this March, neighbors started reporting that the bald eagles were back, flying into the nest with new dead branches they’d pruned off of neighborhood trees. If the nest had been dissuaded from nesting in the city paving project last year, they seemed content with the normal hustle and bustle of community life on Burnns Avenue.

In fact, it wasn’t long before we all noticed that nest construction had been completed and nest-sitting had become the eagles’ order of the day. Like expectant parents, neighbors began talking to neighbors they’d never spoken to before about the thrill of seeing a pair of brooding eagles. Small groups gathered at various spots on Clermont and Burnns where they could catch a glimpse of the eagle parents, and chat about the impending birth.

Though we couldn’t see the eaglets from the street, we knew they’d hatched when mom and dad took turns leaving the nest and returning with the day’s hunt. This was about the time that one neighbor who found a perch on his own rooftop, spotted the two eaglet babies with a video zoom lens.

As thrilling as it was to spot the eaglets, it was like watching the “Discovery” channel to see “Mom” or “Dad” fly in with rodents or large fish clutched in their talons. One Mounds Park neighbor reported that he was strolling in the park with his grandchildren when an adult eagle dove down to catch a live squirrel, then flew up into a tree to subdue the prey by pounding it against the trunk.

Neighbors living near the nest reported finding fish carcasses, bones and gory remains of the nestlings’ diet.

Baby eagles are the largest babies of the bird kingdom, and within a few short weeks, these young eagles had lost their soft gray fuzzy coats to shiny dark brown feathers and were almost in constant view perched on the side of the nest.

Proud “grandparents” could be found on every block of our neighborhood. No matter where you walked or drove in Mounds Park, someone was bound to catch your attention to ask: “Have you seen the eagles?” “What are the eagles up to today?” “Are they flying yet?”

One neighbor wrote on our neighborhood email list: “I uploaded a picture of a couple of young eagles I caught enjoying the morning sun. My understanding is more eagles prefer this neighbor hood than any other in the city.”

The eaglets seemed to enjoy the attention. Sitting on the edge of the nest, they would lean into the wind and then stretch out their wings to full view. They would hop from one foot to the other, or dangle a foot in the air, safely holding on while allowing a gust of wind to lift them slightly above the nest.

By this time, the parents were gone much longer from the nest, pressed into constant hunting to keep the growing eagles fed. When the young eagles finally flew, news spread across the neighborhood at viral speed. Had anyone seen them? Had their first flights been successful? Would they use the nest as its base, or would they leave Mounds Park behind?

The unfolding story was shared through the Mounds Park internet list-serve as a neighborhood full of “mother hens” came together to support a new family in the neighborhood.

Jane Prince lives in Mounds Park.

Dayton’s Bluff

National Night Out is one of the best events each year, where neighbors get together to talk about the neighborhood and have a good time. I enjoy making the rounds and visiting with everyone. I get in my car and try to stop by all of the events in Dayton’s Bluff. Here are just a few.

My first stop was at Parkway Gardens, a 55+ apartment building near Hudson Road and Johnson Parkway.
The meeting room was full of residents participating in an auction of various treasures. I gave a short history of National Night Out and headed off to the next event.

The next stop was the 900 block of Wilson. They had lots of great food and the Great Brodini and his Magic Show entertained everyone. This block has been working on starting a community garden in a vacant lot.

Next, to Mounds Park where the neighborhood celebrated with music from Barra, an Irish band, free corn on the cob, and a potluck.
